The farmers would be the best fighters, but practically all elements of the population would resist — workers, Factory School (FZO) workers, and even some in the $_{50\times1}$ bureaucracy who have close ties with the people and work on their behalf.

7.

If the well-disposed officials are at the collective farm level, the collective farmers will know them; farm chairmen will know those who are sympathetic on the rayon level, and so on up. The same plain arguments about the lot of the people which are addressed to simple folk will count with the sympathetic bureaucrats, and the bureaucrats can best be reached through their relatives or friends on farms.

Networks of acquaintances could be built up in time of peace. They can increase in Networks or acquaintances could be built up in time of peace. They can increase in prestige and strength by passive non-accoperation and small acts of resistance in time of peace. I knew of a farm on which the members warned their chairman that he had better leave them enough grain to carry them through the winter when he paid the State, or there would be trouble. The Chairman met his plan quota in full. The militiaman guarding the delivery was killed and much of the grain disappeared. There were no consequences. Underground organizations would grow faster if they had the idea that there were organizations outside the country that were on their side and might help in the future. might help in the future.
